

GALANA-KULALU

If you ask a random Kenyan what is going on in GALANA-KULALU, you will probably not get any convincing explanation. Or you may be told nothing is going on there.

If you ask a random Kenyan about Silvia Romano, who was kidnapped right next to Galana-Kulalu, you will most likely not get any reasonable response. In fact, asking about Silvia Romano is the easiest way to lose friends in Kenya.

"An ambitious Nairobi-based blogger decided to hit the big league by writing about Silvia Romano. He travelled to Mombasa and looked for the offices of a well-known NGO based in the city.

When he told the gentleman who runs the NGO that he wanted to interview him about Silvia Romano, the human rights activist started sweating. He started trembling uncontrollably. His hands were trembling. His lips were shaking. His teeth were shaking, too.

And he also wet his pants. <https://kenyaiforum.co.ke/viewtopic.php?f=3&t=3428&start=48>"

What is going on in that part of Kenya?

Recently, Israel ambassador to Kenya, Oded Joseph, made it known – using very diplomatic language – that Israel is ready to go to war with Kenya, "if Israel is not allowed to farm maize in Galana-Kulalu for the benefit of Kenyans".

Let us look at the statement above from a different angle. Someone comes to your home, and demands that you let him plant maize in a portion of your land for the benefit of your 'suffering family'. How would you react?

If the person wants to help your 'suffering family', why can't he plant maize at his farm, or buy from wherever, and donate the maize directly to your family?

Kenyans working secretly for Israel will tell you that there is nothing to the story about Galana-Kulalu. But if you ask the same person(s) about Silvia Romano, they get scared to death. Why?

This is an experiment any Kenyan can do: Ask any prominent Kenyan, or a Kenyan with a lot of followers on social media, or a Kenyan working with the civil society, about Silvia Romano. NONE will want anything to do with that question.

The bravest such Kenyan can only mumble: "I don't know anything about that issue." He/she cannot bring themselves to say: "I don't know anything to do with Silvia Romano". They just cannot accept to mention the name SILVIA ROMANO. Why?

If you are scared about talking about an issue, then if you say the issue is not important, you must be lying.

FACT: A Kenyan brave enough to die for his country, a Kenyan brave enough to stand in front of charging Kenya riot police, the same Kenyan will tremble and soil his clothes in fear at the mention of Silvia Romano.

If Israel actually attacked Kenya because of Galana-Kulalu, how would Kenya defend itself?

"Israel's most critical military capability is their small but very deadly submarine fleet. Beyond being able to stealthily spy on enemies, insert operatives onto foreign shores and wreak havoc on enemy ships on a whim, they represent Israel's "second strike" nuclear deterrent.

"The Dolphin class is a diesel-electric submarine developed and constructed by Howaldtswerke-Deutsche Werft AG (HDW) in Kiel, Germany, for the Israeli Navy.

"The Dolphin 2-class are the largest submarines to have been built in Germany since World War II. Each Dolphin-class submarine is capable of carrying a combined total of up to 16 torpedoes and Popeye Turbo submarine-launched cruise missiles. The cruise missiles have a range of at least 1,500 km and are widely believed to be equipped with a 200 kiloton nuclear warhead containing up to 6 kilograms of plutonium."

Therefore, in case of open attack, Kenyan navy would need to be embedded in Indian Ocean fishing boats and surprise any submarine approaching the Kenyan coast.

Interesting times ahead.
